A. Narrative Report of Research, Teaching, and Clinical Contributions:

As a nutritional epidemiologist, my main responsibilities are in teaching and research. I lead the core degree program in cardiovascular epidemiology at the School of Public Health and am the lead instructor for the Cardiovascular Epidemiology course. This serves as the main didactic training program for Cardiovascular Epidemiology in the Harvard Medical Area and serves students at the Medical School and the School of Public Health. This is a survey course which introduces students to the major risk factors for cardiovascular disease. I also co-teach the Practice of Epidemiology course, an intermediate methods course for doctoral students in epidemiology which introduces the fundamentals of grant writing and proposal presentation. I am the primary advisor for four post-doctoral students, five pre-doctoral students and three international fellows at the Harvard School of Public Health and mentor one to two renal fellows per year at the Brigham and Women's Hospital and Harvard Medical School.

My major research interests include the study of dietary etiologies of chronic disease, especially heart disease, stroke, and diabetes; the health effects of antioxidants, vitamins, alcohol, and obesity and related biological and genetic markers; and the development of methodologies to measure dietary factors in epidemiologic studies. In many cases, my approach is to examine these relationships from several different directions. For example, my work on HDL-cholesterol has been to look at the strength of the association of HDL-cholesterol as an independent biological marker of disease, to examine modifiable lifestyle choices such as alcohol consumption, fatty acid intake, physical and sedentary activity that impact blood levels, and finally to examine polymorphisms in genes which regulate circulating levels to determine their impact on disease and on their relationship in modifying known risk factors for coronary heart disease.

In other work on dietary fatty acids, the approach has been to look at contributions of specific fatty acids and then to explore their interactions with each other and with other risk factors. For example, previously, some had hypothesized that a diet high in n-6 fatty acids could attenuate the cardiovascular benefits of a high n-3 diet. However, my work showed that participants with the highest n-3 and n-6 intake have the lowest inflammatory markers - c-reactive protein and tumor necrosis factor alpha. Furthermore, when we looked at risk of coronary disease, we also found that the lowest risk was among participants with the highest level of n-3 and n-6 fatty acids. We extended this work further to show that in the absence of n-3 fatty acids from marine sources, participants who had sufficient intake of shorter chain n-3 intake from vegetable sources still had cardiovascular benefit.

In my work on the health effects of moderate alcohol consumption, I have become a world leader on the health effects of moderate alcohol consumption and led a team of students, post-docs, medical school fellows, and international fellows over the last 15 years and shown that moderate alcohol consumption in men and women lowers the risk of coronary heart disease, stroke, gallstones, and diabetes and that alcohol has beneficial associations with lipids, markers of insulin sensitivity, inflammatory markers and does not lead to weight gain. In our most recent work, we have highlighted the importance of drinking patterns to show that the greatest benefits are among participants who consume only light or moderate amounts on most days per week.

As Associate Director for the Health Professionals Follow-up Study, I also spend a substantial amount of time with administrative duties related to supervising, project development, and budget oversight for the large study of diet and chronic disease centered at the Harvard School of Public Health. Other administrative responsibilities include research and funding as an active co-investigator of the Nurses' Health Study at the Channing Laboratory within the Brigham and Women's Hospital and the Harvard Medical School. As a lead investigator of biomarkers of coronary heart disease within the Nurses' study and the Health Professionals Follow-up Study my funding from governmental, foundation, and corporate sources contributes to core staff and trainee support within the Brigham and Women's Hospital and the Harvard School of Public Health. Because of my background in computer science I serve on the Channing computer advisory board and also currently lead the 5 year project to convert the Laboratory Information Management System to Oracle for the epidemiology unit at the Channing Laboratory. Finally, I contribute annually to Harvard medical area wide seminars on nutrition such as Dean Martin's Longwood Seminars, the Longwood Nutrition Seminars, the Channing Laboratory seminar series, the Department of Nutrition seminar series at the Harvard School of Public Health, and several others.
