

Hannah Leslie is a Postdoctoral Fellow in Margaret Kruk’s Research Group on Quality and Responsiveness in Global Health Systems. She received her MPH in Health and Social Behavior and a PhD in Epidemiology from the University of California, Berkeley. Her dissertation research focused on community determinants of alcohol use and HIV risk in rural South Africa, drawing on measurement tools from educational research as well as analytic methods in causal inference to describe and assess community social factors. She previously worked at the University of California, San Francisco, on monitoring and evaluation of HIV programs in sub-Saharan Africa, particularly East Africa. As a postdoctoral fellow, she works on measurement of quality in global health systems as well as interdisciplinary approaches to identifying determinants and outcomes of health facility quality.